This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1878 edition. Excerpt: ... CHAPTER II. RESIDENCE IN CALCUTTA. The bright morning sun awakened us out of refreshing sleep, such as I had never enjoyed at sea, and it must have been rather late, as the sun does not emerge very early from the morning mists. We dressed quickly, and as carefully as our wardrobe permitted, and waited for the breakfast bell. There was a knock at the door, and Mrs. Wilson herself appeared; she had scarcely seen us in the dusk the evening before, and had come to take us to breakfast. She glanced in amazement from one to the other, and said: 'I expected to see Mrs. Helfer.' 'You were not mistaken,' I answered; 'I am Mrs. Helfer.' 'But,' she went on with some concern, 'in this costume!' My strange appearance, which had not before occurred to me, and the rigid propriety of English ladies, fell heavy on my heart. We had found the Mamaluke dress so very convenient and comfortable, and had become so used to it, that it had not occurred to us to change it, but we now at once perceived the necessity of Europeanising ourselves, and I informed the lady of our intention. 'Come at once then,' she said; 'I will take you to a modiste's near, where you will find the newest fashions from London and Paris'; and without waiting for an answer, as if she could not endure the sight of my dress for a moment, she ordered palanquins to take me to the modiste's, and Helfer to a tailor, for he too had to change his dress. We soon arrived at a splendid shop, furnished with all the most tasteful and elegant requisites for a lady's toilet. I cast my eyes about for the simplest and most modest dresses; but as I also required linen, the proprietress took us up into her bedroom, and ordered piles of things to be brought up. These ladies now undertook to metamorphose me;...
